In an intense autumn season for Fondazione 107, on Saturday 9 October the exhibition spaces in Via Sansovino 234, Turin, will be hosting:

The Take Care Project, curated by Federico Piccari, featuring the facemasks created by the 160 participating artists and the one-person shows of the winners: Pepitabadass, by laia Filiberti, and

Sutura, by Roberto Maria Lino.

The Take Care Project was launched in the midst of the pandemic in 2020 and has now reached its first exhibition with the presentation of the 160 facemasks produced by the artists who took up our invitation. These will be presented together with the two one-person shows of the competition's tied winners: laia Filiberti with Pepitabadass and Roberto Maria Lino with Sutura.

The Take Care Project intends to act as a metaphor of our times, highlighting some of its characteristic elements: the facemask, the object of the artists' works, is a clean sheet where they have written about their experiences in these times of pandemic. Taking care is embodied in the invitation to participate in a trickle-down system: the democratic element of participation, in which each artist or curator was free to invite whomever they wanted, followed by the vote, conducted on the Fondazione 107 website, stressing the strength of social networks and the force of the individual communication of each artist taking part in the project.

"Take Care" is the watchword and the lesson that we must all by now have engraved on our memories after the first wave of the pandemic, the epidemic from Asia that has overwhelmed our lives and heralded a new era. The issue is that of taking care of others, of the weaker and more needy members of a society that has spent far too long obsessing with a concept of personal wellness to the detriment of a healthy concept of community.

Covid19 has transformed our lives, shifted the balance of economic power between nations and continents, widened the yawning gaps between social classes, created a profound divide between those whose work is protected and those who have no defences, changed our worldview and, above all else, deprived us of our sense of security and the freedom to show our fragility.

The pandemic has injected us with a dangerous poison, making us diffident towards others; it has cancelled the typical western habits of shaking hands, embracing, forging relationships and exploring other worlds. It has isolated us in a cocoon where access is denied to others, amplifying the factor of exclusion set in motion by a path along which we had already been guided by technological media.

The artists have expressed conflicting feelings with the 160 facemasks on show: some have transformed the facemask into a votive offering, others into the dream of a meadow, an unwearable sculpture, a written message, a meeting between peoples, a barrier of thorns, a form of protest or a friend waiting ready to cherish us.

The two winners of the Take Care Project are laia Filiberti, an artist from Milan who is presenting Pepitabadass in the exhibition, and Roberto Maria Lino, an artist from Naples, with Sutura.

laia Filiberti introduces us to the world of Pepita, a character inspired by cartoons that she created in 2001, who could be described as her alter ego. Badass expresses her character as a girl with attitude, overpowering and hard as nails, the kind who does not bend. laia Filiberti works with social issues, using Pepita to give them a voice: her position is never politically correct and she shows us as much with a curious, undaunted approach in drawings made with black India ink on paper. Pepita is a contemporary heroine who draws on the past to generate a new contextualisation for it in the present. In Fondazione 107, the artist will also present a series of large-scale India ink drawings featuring Pepita and the armed forces.

Roberto Maria Lino is presenting Sutura, a video performance recorded in Fondazione 107's industrial space, featuring a standard that uses the fabric of the artist's everyday clothes, which he tore off until he was left naked, covering himself with the flag he had stitched and darned himself. He stitched the strips of fabric together, alternating them with pieces torn from the gowns worn by his professional surgeon father, whose name he shares.

That is how Roberto Lino set about illustrating the difficulties encountered in family relations by younger generations trying to carve out an individual identity in a world that is increasingly often prepackaged. Using a needle and thread, he expressed his desire to find common ground in respect for reciprocal choices.
